A smart bedroom will help you fall asleep and wake up in the morning. Why smart bedroom? Bedrooms are a unique room in your living space, you spend a lot of time in it, but most of them are usually you spend sleeping. Adding smarthome technology can improve your bedroom as long as you think about your choices. With the help of several devices, you can make your bedroom more comfortable to sleep and relax. Smart display, lights, smart shades and smart plugs will help you sleep and wake up feeling refreshed. Add smart lights to Start and end the day Philips Sometimes you like to relax in the bedroom before you want to sleep. So you can read or watch TV in bed. The problem is that when you're ready to sleep, the light switches can be out of range. Or the lights may be too bright for your spouse or partner. Smart lights are ideal for control from the comfort of your bed. You can create counters, turn them on or off with your voice or phone, and if you're using smart light bulbs, you can darken or change colors to less sharp for the evening. And with several procedures, you can create the effect of sunrise without having to buy an expensive clock. And if you have a large headrest, you can add ambient light by running the LED strips on the back. You can do the same with the TV in the bedroom. For smart bulbs and LED strips, we recommend philips hue for several reasons. They are fleeing Zigbee, so they are less likely to interfere with Wi-Fi devices. Philips Hue is compatible with both Alexa and the Google Assistant. The Hue app has a built-in wake-up procedure that takes care of the without having to configure multiple procedures. You can pair Hue lights with the Lutron Aurora light switch, which slides over standard light switches. Light, the main problem with philips hue is cost. The starter kit with two white bulbs and hub will bring you back $70. For the price, you have a better class of bulbs, usually brighter and more vivid if you buy colored bulbs. Hue bulbs also utilize Zigbee, which means they work even when the internet is down. Other smart bulbs can rely on Bluetooth or Wi-Fi, so they may have range problems or lose their intelligence when the internet subsides. But if you want to save money, we've also collected cheaper alternatives that you might consider. Smart shades can cut off Ikea lights After taking care of the lights, it is worth considering taking another light source in the bedroom: windows. Smart shades are similar to smart lights: you can live without them and they don't provide a key feature. But once you have them, you may not want to live without them again. Not only can you pick up and lower shades with your voice or phone, but you can create timers and procedures that take care of you. Your routine can pick up shades when it's time to get up or lower them under the bedtime protocol. This is the power of smarthomes: one command can deal with many things. Lutron's Serena Shades works well and is compatible with Alexa, Google Assistant and even Apple Watches. But they are expensive, they often go for hundreds of dollars. If you want to spend less, you can keep an eye on the shades of Fyrtur Ikea. While the company won't release them until October, the price will range between $129 and $179 depending on the size, much cheaper than most competing products. And they will be compatible with both Alexa and google assistant. Consider a voice assistant with Josh Hendrickson's display Bedrooms usually have an alarm clock, but you can upgrade to something better. The smart display can control other smart products throughout your home and provide information such as weather and calendar appointments. You can use the voice assistant without a display, but you'll miss the clock you can read and other visual information. Sometimes it's just quicker to read appointments on your calendar than listen to them one by one, for example. Amazon offers both echo show and spot, and of the two, the Spot is better suited for bedrooms. It is smaller and designed to mimic an alarm clock that helps fit it into the bedroom. But we prefer Google Nest Hub. Unlike Echo devices, Nest Hub doesn't have a camera, which adds a sense of privacy to your bedroom. And it doubles as a digital photo frame, a feature we love. Home Hub also does a better screen tin dilution job than Spot, a feature you might appreciate if you prefer a black room while you sleep. If you'd rather have a Google Assistant, but in a clock-like format like Amazon's Spot, our sister site Review Geek calls lenovo clock almost perfect. At $90, it's almost half the price of a Nest center, smaller, and again ditches the camera for more privacy in if you are in one ecosystem or the other, then ultimately you should guide your decision on which device to buy. Use Smart Plugs For All Your Dumb Stuff By Josh Hendrickson Your bedroom probably has plenty of electronics, be it chargers, fans, heaters, humidifiers or TVs. Smart plug-ins are a great way to give these devices intelligence without having to buy a new TV or reconnect an outlet. Smart plug-ins are also easy to set up; just plug one into an electrical outlet and then plug something into it. You'll need to set it up with the app and then connect it to the Google Assistant or Alexa, but once you do, you'll have your phone and voice control. They are also a great option if you want to go to bed with a fan or space heater, but you don't want them to work all night. And when used correctly, smart plugins can potentially save you money. If you have a habit of leaving a humidifier running all day, a simple clock can take care of this problem. With smart plug-ins, you don't always have to buy a brand new device to provide intelligence and voice control. In the past, we have covered up several inexpensive options that can be cheaper than, for example, buying a new heater. Before you can purchase a smart plug, turn on your devices, disconnect them, and then reconnect them. If they don't turn on and start working automatically, they're not suitable for a smart plug-in. RELATED: The Best Smart Plugs Rounding out the Bedroom Having a wireless charger that's flush with the nightstand is extremely convenient. Josh Hendrickson Some smarthome tech may not be physically present in the bedroom. While a smart thermostat may not save you money, the convenience of changing the set temperature from bed comfort is something you'll appreciate at three o'clock in the morning. Both Nest and Ecobee offer temperature sensors and can help you place one in your bedroom. Depending on the thermostat model you choose and the number of sensors you want, you will spend somewhere between $180 and $350 home furnishings. And it is worth considering adding convenience to the bedroom, which does not belong exactly to the category of smarthome. Wireless chargers are great when the lights are low and trying to find a charging port on your phone is difficult. We like charging pads that immerse themselves in the bedside cabinet, which reduces clutter both in the wire and on the surface. All you need is a hole saw and drill, and a night cabinet that will allow you to run the wire into an outlet from under the top surface. Wireless chargers are relatively inexpensive as well, usually around the $20 mark. However, you may need to provide your own wall adapter. One bedroom specific smart device we're not suggesting is Zigbee fans. Today, the most famous fans are designed to work with Wink, a hub that we no longer recommend. Even if you feel comfortable taking this risk, Alexa integration only provides voice control with built-in light. You need to control all fan operations from the included remote control or You might as well save money and buy a fan with a remote control. Not all suggestions are perfect for every bedroom. Serve your situation and stick to just a smarthome tech that works well in the bedroom. Remember that the goal is to add convenience, not problems and frustrations. Frustration.
